

Rama and the Celestial Laughter Flower

By Info and Support

In the heart of the sunlit kingdom lived three best friends: Prince Rama, who was gentle and wise; his brother Lakshmana, who was clever and quick; and their joyful friend Hanuman, who loved to leap. One morning, the garden was too quiet. The legendary Celestial Laughter Flower—which smelled like giggles and glowed like joy—was gone!

"Oh dear," said Rama. "Only a magical prank could make a flower disappear so fast." Hanuman, using his sharp eyes, spotted something strange near the wall: a shimmering, smoky feather, sparkling with shadow-dust. "Aha!" he cried. "It was the mischievous Kala Shadow Sprite!"

The Kala Sprite was known for borrowing things, never keeping them. The feather pointed toward the Sparkling Forest, a beautiful, misty woods where the trees sang softly. "We must follow," said Lakshmana, grabbing his small, sturdy walking stick. "The forest needs its laughter back!"

Deep within the sparkling woods, they heard a high, sweet chirp. Perched on a glowing moss branch was a magnificent talking parrot named Mitri. Rama approached her kindly. Mitri tilted her head and offered a clue: "Chirp! Chirp! If you seek the laughter, look up high! It's waiting where the sky touches the eye!"

Lakshmana immediately looked at the tallest trees. "The sky touches the eye," he murmured, pacing quickly. "Mitri meant something we can see easily, but is hard to reach—a cluster of luminous sapphire berries high up in the ancient Banyan tree!"

They ran to the giant Banyan. Sure enough, tucked just under a massive branch far above their heads was a small, glittering pouch—the same shimmering shadow-dust they had seen earlier. But the branch was too high for any of them to climb easily.

"No worries," chuckled Hanuman, rubbing his knuckles. "This is a job for a helpful stretch!" He took a deep, quick breath and grew just large enough—for two seconds!—to reach the branch, snatching the shimmering pouch before shrinking back down to his normal, playful size.

Inside the pouch, the Celestial Laughter Flower was safe, glowing gently. But next to the flower was Kala, the mischievous Sprite, tangled up in the silk thread used to tie the pouch closed. Kala wasn't laughing—he was whimpering, sticky and sad!

The Sprite zipped out, suddenly free!
Kala bowed low, flicking his shadow feather in gratitude. He hadn't meant to cause trouble; he just needed someone to help him with the knot he had created! Rama held the Laughter Flower high. Its glow filled the forest.
True strength, the friends learned, wasn't about fighting or size, but about patience and using kindness to untangle every problem.